Present society is an organization society. In an organization society boundaries are mainly drawn, stabilized, transcended and dissolved again by, through and of organizations. For organizations, boundaries are constitutive. Boundary issues are relevant to identity and therefore important for the future viability of any organization, but also for society as a whole. Organizations not only create and stabilize boundaries, but they also transgress their own boundaries and also those that have been drawn from other social actors, or technical operations.

The conceptualization of the relationship between organization and boundaries as well as the study of change and stability of organizational demarcations are therefore of fundamental importance for the formation of organizational education and its practice. In relation to the specific structuring and changing of these manifold overlapping relationships and demarcations between organizations and persons, a multitude of theoretical and empirical questions arise which generate numerous organizational educational tasks and discursive links.

The aim of the conference in Trier is to map and discuss the social and organizational relevance and reflexivity of organizational boundaries and introduce topical questions and perspectives of organizational education to the relevant debates.
